

HIGH SCHOOL HACKS

Every ministry is different. Whether you're teaching middle schoolers, high schoolers, teenagers with disabilities, or all three, here's how to hack this series to fit your unique and diverse audience.

REMEMBER

As high schoolers seek greater independence from parents and adults, their identities and sense of worth are increasingly shaped by their friendships. Throughout this series, help them develop strategies for evaluating their friendships wisely—focusing on identifying supportive, healthy relationships without criticizing or dismissing friendships they already value. Your goal is to guide without judgment, maintaining trust and openness.

REVISE

To make this series more accessible for high schoolers, here's what to adjust...

- For each week's Proverbs verse, challenge high schoolers to "remix" them into modern-day language, memes, or one-sentence advice. This pushes students to internalize the meaning and express it in a format that resonates with how they actually communicate.
- In Week 3's "Good Friends Brainstorm," challenge students to pause and share a real-life example or short story that illustrates one trait of a good friend. High schoolers engage more deeply when they connect abstract ideas to personal experience.
- In Week 4's reflection time during the song "He Calls Me Friend," add a QR code that links to a curated worship playlist. Older students may find music deepens personal reflection and can use this playlist to think about what they learned during the week.

REPLACE

And here are the Building Blocks you may want to swap for something else...

- Instead of using all the suggested video clips, consider having high schoolers record their own responses to prompts using short-form videos. Use the weekly Big Idea as a prompt to ask kids to share their friendship experiences. High schoolers are often more engaged by peer stories than fictional drama, and this helps them find common ground experiences with others in your ministry.
